Hunting whale and seal by kayak and dog-sled, Greenland's Inuit people live a precarious existence. Now, the sea ice that supports their way of life is melting and their villages are under threat.

Stephen Pax Leonard has taken a year off his research at Cambridge to study their unique culture and language. In the first of a series, he sends a remarkable and worrying dispatch from the Arctic.